© craigslist - Map data © OpenStreetMap
(google map) (yahoo map)

This 1928 American standard toilet with wall-hung tank is in very good condition. This model features the porcelain handle with the more stylized/detailed tank and tank-lid.

While this toilet can hold 5 gallons in the tank it is easy to adjust the level down to 2 gallons or so and still flush well. Toilet has been acid-washed to remove lime deposits.

Needs new brass goods for installation, all available.

KITCHEN INTERIORS — 1900 TO 1919

One of the first things that strikes you about American kitchens from 1900 through the 'teens is how simple they were.

The kitchen was a workroom and often relatively small even in large homes. There was typically a sink with a counter or drainboard on either side, a woodburning or gas range, and table. Some cabinetry might have been built in, but not always. Shelving was often open and free-standing cupboards were common.

The second essential component of the kitchen was a pantry that was integrated more or less into the kitchen. Depending on the configuration, it may have been a butler's pantry where dinnerware and dishes were washed and stored. Typically a small room between the kitchen and the dining room, the butler's pantry served as a buffer between the smells and heat of the kitchen and the calm civility of the dining room.

A more familiar function of the pantry was its use as a convenient store room for staples, canned goods, cleaning equipment, and cooking equipment not used on a daily basis. Occasionally, homes had both a utility pantry and a butler's pantry as seen in Radford's 1908 Design 7011.

If the quantity of published kitchen images is any indication, little consideration was given to organizing this space beyond what was deemed necessary for healthy food production. Housewives were advised to keep it simple and clean. Often, the kitchen was the domain of a day servant or maid in many middle-class households.

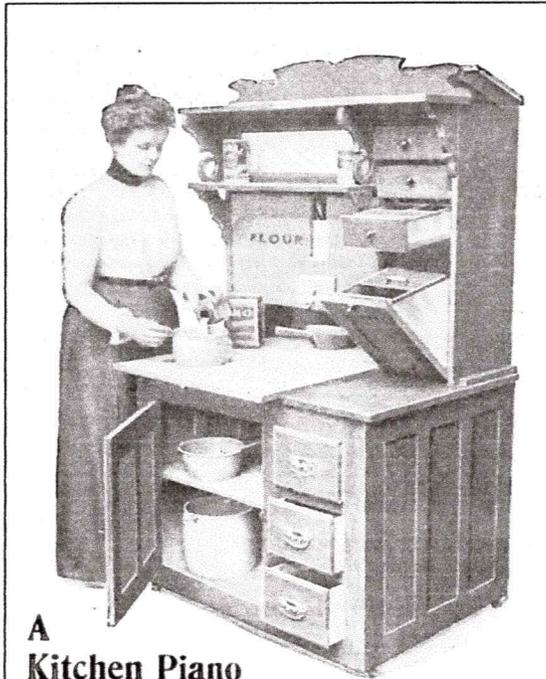

The early beginnings of the modern kitchen

In the late 1890s the kitchen began its change into the well-appointed room we know today. With the Industrial Revolution came new concepts in efficiency. Scientific discoveries of microscopic life, like bacteria known to cause disease, became the fodder of many an article in various publications exhorting homemakers to adhere to the highest standards of cleanliness. Though we don't give them a thought today, terrible diseases like typhoid and cholera were scourges that were well known then. (House Beautiful ran a regular series on household science and covered the basics of chemistry and bacteriology.)

One innovation was the "Kitchen Piano." In kitchens that had virtually no conveniences but running water (which at the time would have been considered miraculous by grandmothers), a kitchen cabinet that provided "everything at her fingers' ends" would have found a ready audience in American homemakers. One of the first companies to advertise this remarkable kitchen center was the Hoosier Manufacturing Company of New Castle, Indiana. The image (top right) shows one of the earliest ads as it was published in Ladies Home Journal in 1901. Over the next three decades, Hoosier would continue to refine its design and attract such competitors as McDougall and Sellers.

Keeping it cool

It was well understood that keeping food cool prolonged its life and prevented food poisoning. Refrigeration as we know it today was unknown, however, in 1900.
